The homepage suggests it'll be an 80 character password. Is that all it takes to set up a school account or is there more security involved? Our son knows nothing about computers and it'll be his first time using the computer for anything besides homework. Help! [QUOTE=Inventor;149164]Is that all it takes to set up a school account or is there more security involved?[/QUOTE] The simplest way to do this is to get an email address that belongs to you. That's what all these schools use, since the email address is free. If you have some of your own email addresses you could set up a school account with just a few of them. One of the best ways to "sign up" at school is to tell the teacher that you're going to have your parents' permission to use the computer. With the advent of the internet and internet access, most teachers will grant the permission right there on the spot. For more difficult cases, you could have your son look up your email address on the internet and then send a message to the school (probably his teachers) saying "I am sending this email to Mrs. Smith at school. She is in charge of the computer and I'm going to be using it. Please look up my email address here and tell me if it's ok to let him use it". If you have multiple email addresses (or just two, if you want him to have the control), you could give him one of those email addresses and let him use it to sign up. Make sure you tell your son that "you don't need to look up his email address on the internet". I'm not sure if the registration is done online, but your son may have to use a computer at school. If you told him that you were sending the email from an email address of yours, then he wouldn't have to look up anything. Another option is to get him to use an email account that you have (that he's not going to use for anything else) and tell him to send you an email from that account. Most school systems will have a web site where you can make an account and then use it to check your email and look up things like how to get in touch with teachers and such. I don't remember where it is now, but this was when I was in high school. I can't 82157476af
